Studio ThusThat

ThusThat is a research-led design practice exploring experimental materials to uncover the hidden narratives behind industrial production, consumption, and waste. Working at the intersection of science, industry, and design, the studio investigates how materials are sourced, valued, and transformed, revealing new potential within overlooked or discarded resources. Through collaborations with academic institutions, industrial partners, architectural studios, and global brands, ThusThat translates scientific research and industrial processes into objects, systems, and spatial proposals. Its practice prioritizes process, ethics, and environmental impact alongside form, with a particular focus on sustainability, circularity, and alternative production models. By challenging conventional manufacturing approaches, the studio proposes new possibilities for material use and production. Through research and experimentation, ThusThat creates work that not only questions established industrial practices but also contributes to more responsible and forward-looking directions in contemporary design.
