DESIGNER

Serge Mouille

Serge Mouille (1922–1988) was a French industrial designer and master metalworker whose work stands as a defining reference in modern lighting design. Born in Paris to a modest family, Mouille developed an early fascination with nature during childhood visits to his grandparents' farm and frequent hours spent drawing plants and animals at the Jardin des Plantes. The organic structures he observed—the veining of leaves, the articulation of skeletons, the growth of shells—would later inform the biomorphic language of his designs. At a remarkably young age, Mouille entered the École des Arts Appliqués in Paris, where he studied metallurgy and silversmithing under sculptor own metalworking studio and soon began teaching at the school himself. Initially commissioned for handrails and decorative metalwork, his practice shifted decisively toward lighting in the early 1950s, notably through his collaboration with Jacques Adnet. Mouille's iconic lamps—angular, insect-like structures with slender black steel arms and sculptural shades—introduced a sense of movement and kinetic balance to space. Exhibited at the Steph Simon Gallery and recognized with major awards, his work remains celebrated for its technical rigor, sculptural elegance, and enduring modernity, and continues to be produced today using his original methods.
