Thomas Van Noten approaches design as a continuous act of exploration, driven by curiosity, experimentation, and human interaction. His studio, TOGIGI, functions as both laboratory and atelier, where research and making become tools for developing new techniques and discovering meaning through context. Each project begins with a conceptual framework from which form gradually emerges, bringing innovation and craftsmanship into dialogue. Rather than adhering to fixed typologies, Van Noten allows his work to evolve through material research, testing, and intuitive processes. Materials are sourced from the immediate environment and explored through direct, tactile engagement, often responding to natural processes or the tensions created in opposition to them. These contradictions become generative forces, shaping objects that feel experimental yet grounded, refined yet instinctive. Through this approach, TOGIGI creates works defined by material honesty and conceptual depth—quiet investigations into form, process, and place, where making becomes a means of understanding the world.
