Driven by an insatiable curiosity, Thomas Van Noten approaches design as a continuous act of exploration—one shaped by new influences, evolving processes, and human interaction. TOGIGI, his studio, operates as both laboratory and atelier: a space where experimentation is not an outcome, but a method through which techniques are developed and objects acquire meaning through their context. Each project begins with a conceptual framework from which form gradually emerges. Innovation and craftsmanship exist in deliberate dialogue, as traditional knowledge is reinterpreted through contemporary practices. Van Noten's work resists fixed typologies, instead unfolding from the immediate environment and explored through direct, tactile engagement. They are often informed by natural processes—or by tensions that arise in opposition to them—allowing contradictions to become generative forces within the work. Through this approach, TOGIGI produces objects that are both experimental and grounded, refined yet instinctive. The resulting body of work is defined by material honesty and conceptual depth, offering a quiet but rigorous investigation into form, process, and place—where making becomes a means of understanding the world it inhabits.
